Compact and easy to use, Monitor Test provides one of the most important and useful visualization systems to measure CPU usage and for more detailed information on system resources. Besides specifying the resource type (Process, Memory, Disk, etc.), Monitor Test can be used for determining the machine's capabilities and displaying information about CPU usage, memory allocation, processing speed and internal settings (in particular, permissions to install software). Evaluation and conclusion Monitor Test does its work without generating any performance impact. It works smoothly on all platforms and requires little system resources. While the "Alert List" offers valuable information (errors, services, applications, system status), it's not very helpful for quick testing or small-scale monitoring. Its performance is excellent and it supports running on the desktop, in the tray, or in the taskbar. If you have any queries or comments regarding this tool, we'd love to hear from you. Apart from that, it also has a couple of useful features such as a reboot notification, and the option to choose from 3 different libraries - System, Drivers and Disk. Evaluation and conclusion The application is simple and easy-to-use, but if you want more detailed information it's worth looking at the options available. Moreover, it doesn't have a message box notification, although that's not too important. It doesn't provide the capabilities to display detailed information about system resources, and is lacking in customization options (it can't display custom thumbnails or icons). However, it's enough for the basic needs of end users. We also think that it's well-placed among all of the similar products.
